What Makes a Home Manly?

For some guys, a house is just a pile of sticks. But others see where they hang their hat as an expression of their true identity. "Masculine design can be seen in textures, colors and materials used," says Meg Caswell, host of the DIY Network's Meg's Great Rooms. In other words, it's not just about that 60" plasma with the blabberdy-blah sound system and receiver. It's about finding the right chair to match that custom-built oak mantle. Or taking pride in the contours of an archway. Or, to paraphrase the Big Lebowski, finding a rug that really ties the room together. See, men don't just build. They create. For visual evidence, check out these modern American temples dedicated to testosterone.

The Farmer's Fantasy

Would you want to live in a barn? Richard Landry does, and he's pretty proud of it. The Quebec native designed this 5,000-square-foot Malibu home by incorporating remnants from a 100-year-old barn being demolished in his hometown. The aged timber is the main building material for this place, which sits on 15 acres that includes a running stream, a stable, and a swimming pool of corrugated metal. Using frontier craftsmanship as the main design theme, this paint-free home also has concrete block and slab, pecan wood floors, and both marble and granite in the bathrooms. "Masculine design can be seen in elements such as exotic woods, steel, glass and natural stone," says Meg Caswell, host of the DIY Network's Meg's Great Rooms. That said, Landry's place has plenty of modern conveniences, too, including surround sound inside and out, Crestron home control, and an industrial-looking, butt-kicking gym area.
